

Who should be president?

Choosing who should be president is one of the most significant decisions a citizen can make, and there isn't one "correct" answer that applies to everyone. The "right" candidate usually depends on your personal values, your vision for the country, and which issues you prioritize.

If you are trying to decide who to support, it can be helpful to break the decision down into a few key categories:

1. Policy and Issues

Consider which areas of governance impact your life or your community the most. Common "litmus test" issues include:

- The Economy: Inflation, tax structures, job creation, and housing affordability.
- Healthcare: Access, cost, and reproductive rights.
- Foreign Policy: Alliances, trade, and involvement in international conflicts.
- Environment: Climate change policies and energy independence.

2. Leadership Style and Character

Beyond what they promise to do, consider how they will do it.

- Temperament: How do they handle crises or opposition?
- Experience: Does their background (legislative, executive, or private sector) prepare them for the demands of the office?
- Integrity: Do you trust their judgment and their commitment to the Constitution?

3. Vision for the Future

Every candidate offers a different "story" about where the country is headed. Some focus on systemic change and progress, while others focus on stability, tradition, or returning to successful policies of the past.

How to Research

To make an informed choice, it helps to look beyond campaign ads and social media:

- Read Official Platforms: Visit candidate websites to see their specific policy proposals.
- Watch Debates/Interviews: See how they perform under pressure and answer unscripted questions.
- Use Non-Partisan Tools: Sites like Ballotpedia or Isidewith can help you compare your views directly against the candidates' records.

Ultimately, the best person for the job is the one you believe will most effectively represent your interests and uphold the responsibilities of the office.
